

RUDNER LAW

I went to law school because I have a strong belief in fairness and justice. When I was younger, my grandmother shared a story of when she was a young woman working in an office in Montreal. Times were tough, money was scarce and jobs hard to find.

My grandmother told her boss that she would need a few days off to observe the Jewish High Holidays, and was told, effectively, that if she did not come to work on those days, she should not bother coming back at all. Despite the fact that her family needed the income from her job, my grandmother stood by her convictions and did not work on the High Holidays. Fortunately, she did not lose her job. However, many people still encounter situations like this and don't know what to do or how to protect themselves. At the same time, employers that try to do the right thing are often taken advantage of by employees that abuse their rights. I went to law school to be able to help people understand and protect their rights. As an employment lawyer, I love working with real people, in everyday situations, in order to do so.

I am passionate about providing strategic, cost-effective and practical advice to my clients, and advocating on behalf of those who need legal representation. I love to be seen as a Strategic Partner.
